

Whatever sort of headgear Dame Fashion has in her cranial for the winter season, the men at least are praying that it will not be those pot-shaped chapeaux with a New England boiled dinner string around the outer edge. Of course, every man knows that any old style of hat is sometimes pretty and frequently bewitching, but a man has to have a good deal of elasticity in his imagination in order to see any real comeliness in a hat shaped like a cross between a woman's head and a headgear, and an old-fashioned brass kettle. When, in addition to the grotesqueness of the shape, one puts all sorts of alleged vegetables around the crown, the thing becomes almost obnoxious. It could never have been one of those that the witty Irishman had in mind when he said:

"And tied neath her chin was the wickedest hat That a purty girl ever wore."

Only ten days remain before the departure of the Twenty-ninth regiment from Fort Douglas, and it is to be said that no regiment has left with warmer or more sincere friends in Salt Lake than will be left behind with the passing of the Twenty-ninth. Besides the fact that not a few of Salt Lake's finest girls have cast their lots with the army officers since the coming of the regiment, there have been most cordial relations between the townspeople and the officers and ladies of Fort Douglas since their coming. Their friends have but the one wish—that their lines may be cast in pleasant places.

The country places around about are proving the attractions these days. The Frank Judges are to have a crowd out for Sunday afternoon tea today at their country home. The Cobbles, and later a number of the guests and several of the officers will motor out to Mrs. Winnie Walker's idyllic will enjoy their Sunday night supper on the farm. With a waxing moon and the roads in fairly good shape there should be something doing in the line of autumn announcements.
